Food For Thought

"You see things; and you say "why?"
But I dream of things that never were, and I say "Why not?"

Over the last couple of months I have had the pleasure of designing a new web site for ART and a tri-fold brochure for a local credit union:

Advanced Radiant Technologies (ART) located in Seattle, WA

A respected industry leader in the craftsman tradition of radiant technology application, Advanced Radiant Technology (ART) designs and installs custom hydronic and radiant floor heating systems along with boiler service and replacement.

You can view ART's new web site here.

Thinking of Cutting Your Marketing Budget?

When the economy struggles, marketing dollars are often the first to go. I urge you to hesitate before bringing the ax down, this decision will only hurt you in the long run, as it is a short-term fix.

Marketing is part of the solution not the problem. It's part of a company's core business strategy; if you cut it, you're cutting your business strategy.

If you stop advertising for two months, sales won't stop, but in four or five months down the line, you'll see the hit. If you turn off the engines off a plane flying at 36,000 ft, it does not drop out of the sky, it gradually loses altitude.

Continues

According to Milward Brown research: Consumers base their product choices as follows: 59% of consumers buy goods on the strength of a brand, 84% are brand driven purchases, and only 10% are price driven purchases, such as utilities, fuel and apparel. Consumers in a downturn buy brands they associate with quality and longevity, so it stands to reason that brands that lose face-time with their audience, eventually will lose their hold on their market-share.

This is the perfect time to get smarter about your marketing dollar and spend it to bring results. The key is to look at your marketing dollars as an investment, not an expense. Use the customer knowledge that you have and implement creative marketing during these times of financial distress.

During the Great Depression, WK Kellogg continued to market his cereals as all his rivals were cutting back: in doing so, he pulled ahead in sales, a change that has never been reversed.

During an economic downturn, your focus shifts, but to get on top you need to reach the right people, focus on the brand, talk while people are silent and most of all you have to be CREATIVE:

Clever cost strategies

Research your customer thoroughly: be where they are

Encourage new ideas from your employees and clients

Assess and allocate the budget: advertizing is not the only marketing discipline

Target and reach out to them: spark a conversation

Investigate and talk to the right people

Value your marketing department

Enjoy the journey
